

Vassar is quite a training camp these martial days. Even the bed making drill is run on military lines.

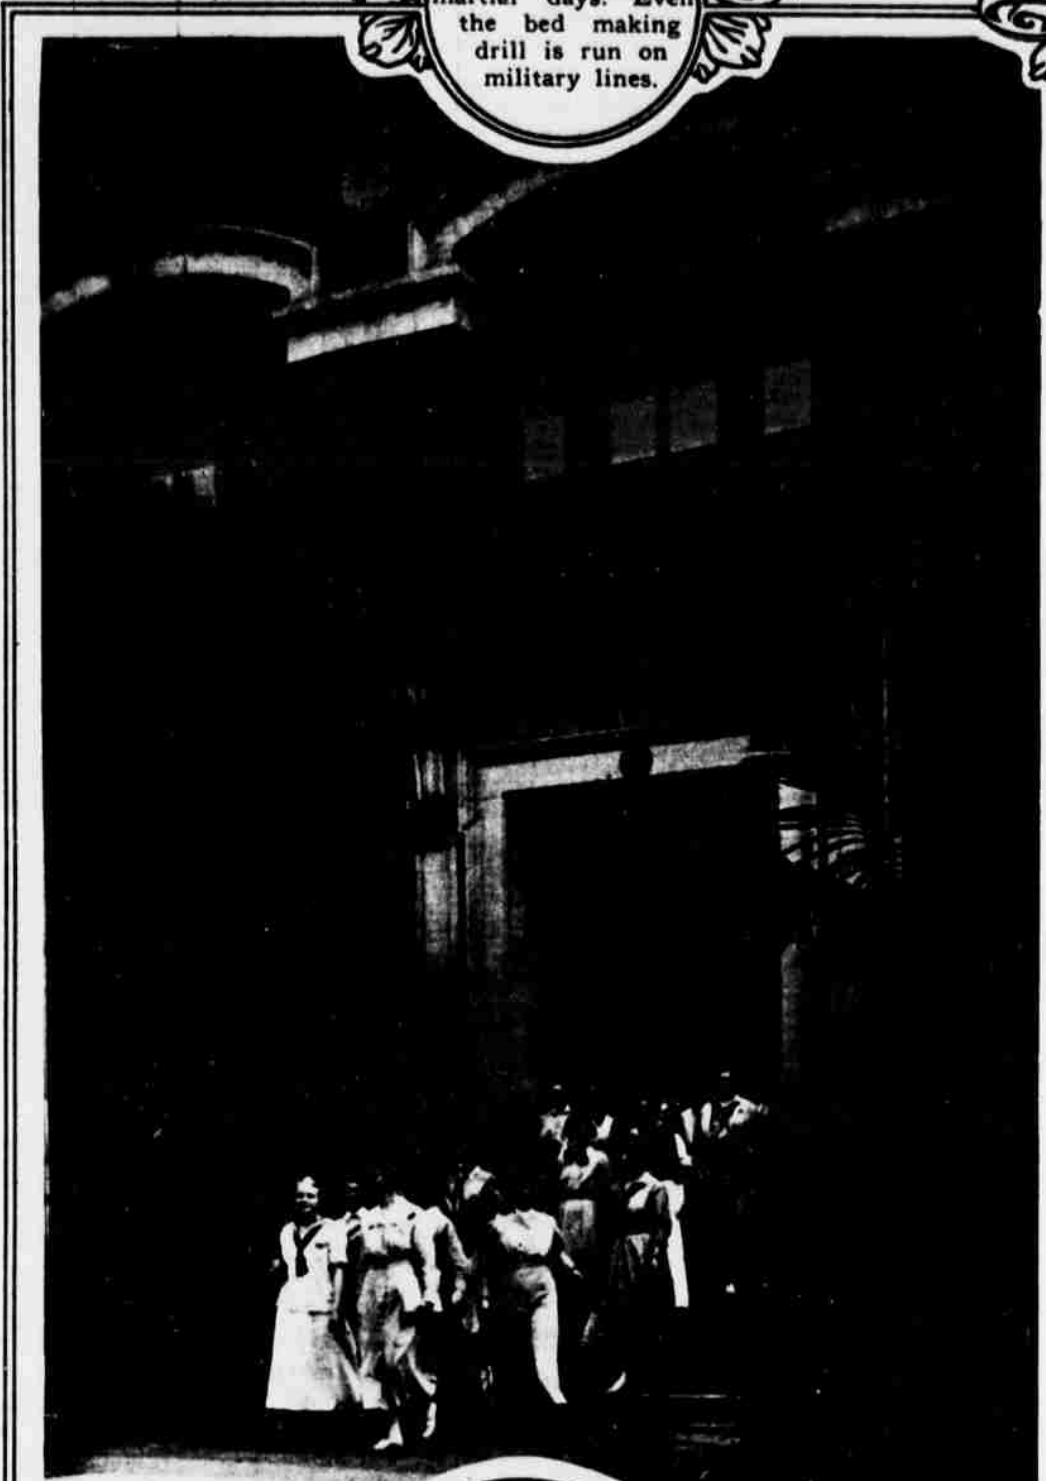

The class in bacteriology has succeeded in getting plenty of microscopes, despite scarcity of such instruments.

Vassar College in War Times

Photos by Paul Thompson.

The class in materia medica at work in the laboratory, learning to use drugs, making solutions and putting up prescriptions.

Students in the anatomy and bacteriology classes coming out of the New England Building, where they have been getting some practical instruction.

A blood pressure demonstration proves of absorbing interest. In work of this sort the students get practical experience as well as instruction.

A section of the dining room in one of the residence halls, showing the girls at lunch. The table is partly supplied from the fruits of the labor of Vassar farm workers.

A class in practical nursing meets in the gymnasium. The instructors in this course are on leave of absence from hospitals. The "patient" is a recruit from the ranks, who seems to like her job.